

Competing interests

According to the International Committee of Medical Journal Editors uniform declaration of competing interests, editors, associate editors and authors should disclose four types of information:

1. Their associations with commercial entities that provided support for the work reported in the submitted manuscript, either by grants, by writing assistance or by any other means (the time frame for disclosure in this section of the form is the lifespan of the work being reported).
2. Their associations with commercial entities that could be viewed as having an interest in the topic of the submitted manuscript (the time frame for disclosure in this section is the 36 months before submission of the manuscript).
3. Any similar financial associations involving their spouse or their children under 18 years of age.
4. Non-financial associations that may be relevant to the submitted manuscript.

Scandinavian Journal of Work, Environment & Health policy

When taking a decision on a manuscript, Scandinavian Journal of Work, Environment & Health editors and reviewers should know about the competing interests of the authors. A paper will not be rejected due to a competing interest, but competing interest must be publicly declared.

When professional judgement concerning a primary interest (ie, validity of research) could be influenced by a secondary interest (ie, a financial interest), a competing interest exists.

Perceptions of this competing interest are as important as actual ones.

Possible competing interests include: board membership, consultancy, employment, expert testimony grants (including pending), contract research, lectures/other education events, speakers' bureaux, patents (planned, pending or issued), receipt of equipment or supplies, royalties, stock/stock options/other forms of ownership, additional expenses not included in competing interests already specified, other personal or professional relationships that may influence or appear to influence.

All authors must declare their conflicts of interest as part of a summary of all authors of the manuscript when submitting to the Journal. In most cases only where there are competing interests will this be declared in the published article. The Journal will not necessarily always note where no interests are declared.
